

AFTER EVERY CONVERSATION

Still know who you met by Friday.

You met twelve people. By Friday you can name two. Forty seconds after each conversation fixes it. Six things, in order. A pen works.

ONE

Write their name and one thing they said.

Not the job title. The title is on the badge.
The line is what you will recognise them by,
and what you open with when you write.

Like this

Sarah, Bristol, hates the word synergy.

TWO

Write what they asked you for.

In their words. If they asked for nothing, write that too. It tells you what kind of conversation it was.

Like this

The name of the supplier. The article. Word for word.

THREE

Write what you promised.

The exact thing, with the day. Most follow-ups die here: you remember a warm conversation and forget the offer you made inside it.

Like this

Send the deck by Thursday.

FOUR

Write the one line you would introduce them with.

If you cannot write it, you did not find out who they are. Go back and ask one more question.

Like this

Sarah runs ops for a Bristol logistics firm and knows the market.

FIVE

Put the follow-up in the calendar now.

Before the next conversation, not at the end of the night. Nine tomorrow, with their line in the reminder, so you know what to say.

Like this

Thu 09:00. Sarah. Synergy. Send deck.

SIX

Send it tonight. Two lines, their words.

The thing they said and the thing you promised. Nothing about you. Almost nobody does this, so you are remembered.

Like this

Good to meet you, Sarah. Deck attached, as promised, and no synergy in it.

THAT IS THE WHOLE SYSTEM
